- d. Criminal justice

ANSWER: b

85. Which term refers to the protection of the rights of the individual?

- a. Due process
- b. Crime control
- c. Criminal defenses
- d. Criminal justice

ANSWER: a

86. Contrast the due process and crime control models of criminal justice.

ANSWER: The crime control model’s key goal is the repression of criminal conduct, which is accomplished by apprehending, convicting, and punishing offenders. The crime control model advocates expeditious processing of offenders and reliance on informal fact-finding by the police and prosecutors to achieve the correct result. Crime is a breakdown of individual responsibility and self-control, and punishment acts as a deterrent as well as incapacitates offenders. Eliminating loopholes like the exclusionary rule and insanity defense is necessary to keep offenders from beating the system.

The due process model emphasizes protecting individual rights. Though concerned about crime, they believe that granting too much leeway to police will only result in the loss of freedom and civil liberties of all. The due process model supports the presumption of innocence and enforces beliefs that formal fact-finding in an adversarial process will achieve the correct result. What the crime control model views as obstacles to justice are seen by due process advocates as necessary checks on unwarranted prosecutions. Emphasis is on the need to reform people through rehabilitation, which is best accomplished through increased use of community-based sentencing alternatives rather than prison sentences.

87. List the steps in processing a typical felony case. Briefly describe what happens at each step.

ANSWER: 1) Arrest: the police take the defendant into custody, and they enter the criminal justice system. 2) Initial appearance: the defendant is brought before the judge without unnecessary delay. 3) Bail: set during the initial appearance. 4) Grand jury or preliminary hearing: the prosecution must show probable cause that the defendant committed the crime. 5) Arraignment on charges: the formal charges are read, and the defendant enters a plea. 6) Pretrial discovery and suppression of evidence. 7) Plea negotiation. 8) Trial. 9) Sentencing. 10) Appeal.

88. Describe some of the key differences between the law on the books and the law in action.

ANSWER: The law on the books describes what the law should be, based on the articulated rules of American law found in constitutions, cases, judicial opinions, and administrative rules and regulations. The law on the books differs significantly from the law in action in many respects.

The law in action reveals what actually happens in criminal courts. Examples may include the reality that while there are more than 13 million arrests each year, about half actually result in the filing of charges. Grand juries are groups of citizens who are given the responsibility for charging in felony cases, but they almost always indict the defendants that prosecutors want charged. Felony defendants have a right to file a motion to suppress unconstitutionally seized evidence, but those motions are rarely granted.

89. Contrast the roles of trial and appellate courts.

ANSWER: Most courts are trial courts. This is where trials are held, jurors are sworn, and witnesses are questioned. Trial courts are divided into major and lower courts. In lower courts, minor offenses are tried in front of a judge, and the initial stages of felony cases—first appearance, arraignment, probable cause hearings—are held. Major trial courts handle the final phases of felony prosecutions, whether the defendant enters a guilty plea or takes the case to trial. Upon conviction, the defendant is sentenced. Appellate courts review the decisions made by trial courts when issues are raised on appeal. In appellate courts, lawyers argue whether previous decisions correctly or incorrectly followed the law. Appellate review is not a trial. No witnesses are questioned, and no jurors are called upon to render a decision. There are two levels of appellate courts at both the state and federal levels: intermediate courts, which must hear all cases, and supreme courts, which pick and choose which cases they hear. The ultimate appellate court in the United States is the U. S. Supreme Court.

90. Discuss the function and importance of the grand jury.

ANSWER: The grand jury is designed as a check on unwarranted prosecutions. All federal prosecutions and about half of the states require grand juries. The defendant and his/her attorney are not allowed to present evidence, call witnesses, or even be physically present. Grand jury proceedings are held in secret. Prosecutors must convince a majority of the grand jurors that a crime was committed and that there is probable cause that the defendant committed the crime. If the grand jury finds probable cause, it returns an indictment (true bill) that charges the defendant with the crime. If it refuses to indict the defendant, it is called a no bill or no true bill. Although the purpose of the grand jury is to safeguard against arbitrary or malicious prosecutions, In reality, grand juries are dominated by the prosecutor and rarely fail to indict in cases brought before them.

Chapter 01 - Crime, Law, Courts, and Controversy

91. Explain the function of the criminal justice system from both an interdependent system perspective as well as a fragmented non-system perspective.

ANSWER: The interdependent system perspective on criminal justice dominates contemporary thinking. It highlights the fact that police, courts, and corrections are interdependent and interrelated. Though separate, they must interact with one another. What one part of the criminal justice system does or doesn't do directly affects the other two. The operations of law enforcement and corrections affect the judiciary. If more felons are arrested, the workload of prosecutors increases. The more overcrowded the prisons, the more difficult it is to make sentencing decisions. The decisions that courts make also have important consequences for law enforcement and corrections. The interdependence, however, does not necessarily translate into coordination and cooperation.

The fragmented non-system perspective highlights the fragmentation that characterizes each component of criminal justice. Nearly 18,000 law enforcement agencies at the local, state, and federal levels operate independently of each other. There are more than 1,700 state and federal correctional facilities and thousands of local jails. Corrections also encompass community-based corrections such as probation, drug treatment, and halfway houses. Prosecutors and courts exist at the local, country, state, district, and national levels. This complexity and fragmentation can lead to conflict between the various elements of the criminal justice system, resulting in inefficiencies and inconsistencies that hinder the achievement of justice.

92. Which amendments from the Bill of Rights are pertinent to criminal procedure? Describe what rights they provide for defendants.

ANSWER: The Fourth Amendment provides protection against unreasonable searches and seizures and outlines warrant requirements. The Fifth Amendment provides the right against self-incrimination and against double jeopardy. The Sixth Amendment provides the right to counsel, a speedy and public trial by jury, the right to confront and cross-examine witnesses, and the right to compel witnesses to appear and testify. The Eighth Amendment prohibits cruel and unusual punishments and excessive bail and fines. These rights are the basis for the protection of defendants' due process rights in criminal procedure. All of these Amendments in the Bill of Rights (the first ten Amendments to the Constitution) have been incorporated to apply to state criminal proceedings through the Fourteenth Amendment.

93. Identify and explain the importance of the three key characteristics of the common law.

ANSWER: The three key characteristics of common law are: judge-made law, precedent, and multiple sources of law. Until the late 19th century, no important body of statutory law existed in either England or the United States. Rather, judges organized social relationships through law. Although legislation bodies, not the courts, now define crimes, contemporary statutory definitions often reflect their common law heritage. The doctrine of precedent requires a judge to decide a case by applying the rule of law found in previous cases, provided the facts in the current case are similar to the facts in the previous cases. By following previous court decisions, the legal system promotes the twin goals of fairness and consistency. Multiple sources of law mean that it is not sufficient to look only at the legislative act when defining a crime. It is also necessary to know how the courts have interpreted the statute. Depending on the issue, the applicable rules of law may be found in constitutions, statutes, state administrative regulations, or court decisions.

94. You are a judge in New York City at the time that the Derek Chauvin/George Floyd case is going on. You are familiar with and have personally dealt with crimes of racial profiling in the past, but with this recent case, they have become more publicized and prominent. Claims of racial profiling in who was stopped, questioned, and frisked by New York City Police Department officers led to the federal courts adjudicating several class action civil rights lawsuits that ultimately resulted in a settlement involving judicial oversight of police stop-and-frisk activities. Because of this, the Black Lives Matter movement was formed. Your viewpoint as a judge is that stop and frisk would be a helpful and necessary part of keeping the city safe. With your viewpoint as well as the above information, including recent racial profiling cases, how would you reexamine the use of force being legally justified? How do the facts about a case influence your opinion? Do you agree with the outcome of the Derek Chauvin/George Floyd case? Please fully explain.

ANSWER: Student responses will vary depending upon opinions. However, students should discuss that hate crimes as criminal offenses are motivated in whole or in part by an offender's bias against a race, religion, disability, sexual orientation, ethnicity, gender, or gender identity. Although motive is usually not required to prove a crime, motive is an essential element of proving a hate crime. As a judge, they would need to examine the facts of the case to see if prosecution as a hate crime is appropriate. Students might point out that race and ethnic biases account for the highest number of hate crimes reported to police each year, with the African American community being specifically targeted.

Students should also discuss the specifics of the Derek Chauvin/George Floyd case and whether they agree that Derek Chauvin was guilty of murder. They should offer ideas about ways that law enforcement can conduct its job, such as the use of stop and frisk, without targeting particular racial groups. Students might specifically discuss efforts to defund police departments, the use of a database to track police officer misconduct, and prohibiting dangerous restraint techniques.

95. American government is based on the principle of federalism, which distributes governmental power between national (usually referred to as federal) and state governments. In turn, state governments create local units of government, such as counties and cities. Each of these levels of government has its own array of police, courts, and corrections. This decentralization adds tremendously to the complexity of the American criminal justice system. For example, depending on the nature of the law allegedly violated, several different prosecutors may bring charges against a defendant, including the following: city attorney (local), district attorney (county), attorney general (state), U.S. attorney (U.S. district court), and U.S. attorney general (national).

You are a student who is curious about the different types of attorneys but think you would be more interested in looking into being a city attorney in a large city. In your research, what do you find out about the types of cases you may be involved in? Which types of cases would you be most and least interested in, and why? Are any of them, in your opinion, easier or more difficult than another? Please fully explain.

ANSWER: Student responses will vary depending upon their research and opinions about which types of cases would be the most interesting or difficult to try. Students will likely discuss the more varied range of cases they might find in a large city, as opposed to a more rural environment. Students might find that this varied range is more interesting, but they might also find the environment more stressful.

96. Consider that you are a deputy, and have just reviewed the following principles of contemporary criminal procedure:

- a. An involuntary statement is considered to be inherently untrustworthy or unreliable, and convictions based on unreliable evidence violate due process.
- b. Coercive police practices are a violation of fundamental fairness, an essential element of due process; therefore, a confession coerced by the police violates due process, even if that confession is otherwise reliable.
- c. Free choice is an essential aspect of due process, and an involuntary confession cannot be the product of a person's free and rational choice.

In your opinion, sometimes there are situations where force is necessary to gain confessions. With this in mind, but also considering the above principles, how forceful is acceptable and why? What are better alternatives? Also, what do you think should have happened to cases where force was exercised prior to the Brown v. Mississippi case? Have you heard of any cases since then that have used force to any degree? What are your thoughts on those cases? Please fully explain.

ANSWER: Student responses will vary depending upon their opinions about what constitutes "reasonable" force by law enforcement. Students should discuss Brown v. Mississippi and what situations would lead to an unreliable confession. Students might also discuss psychological techniques that could be used to obtain a confession (lying to suspects or depriving them of food/water, for instance) and whether this acceptable or not. They might mention cases they have heard in the media where confessions were obtained that were later questioned as being involuntary. They might mention the Derek Chauvin/George Floyd case where, even though a confession was not involved, the use of force by law enforcement was deemed unacceptable.

Students should discuss whether all previous physically obtained confessions should have been invalidated after the ruling in Brown v. Mississippi.

Chapter 01 - Crime, Law, Courts, and Controversy

97. You are a prosecuting attorney reviewing a textbook about criminal justice. What would be the most important things you would look for when the text describes what makes felonies, misdemeanors, and violations different from each other? The next day you are dealing with a new case. What kinds of things would you take into consideration when determining what charge an offense is? Are there any things that you think could be considered as more than one offense or could even border one or another offense (as in, is there an offense that could be considered a felony or a misdemeanor?). How would you make your determination? Give an example and fully explain.

ANSWER: Student responses will vary. They should be able to identify that in setting penalties, the law often makes a distinction based on the seriousness of the offense. The most serious crimes are called felonies, and, in most states, they are punishable by one year or more in prison. Less serious offenses are called misdemeanors, which are typically punishable by up to a one-year sentence in a local jail. And finally, the least serious offenses are called violations, which are subject to fines or very short jail terms.

Students should identify a factual situation and discuss how it could be a more or less serious crime (or perhaps not a crime at all). For example, if the victim was hit by a car and killed, the incident could result in no crime (it was an accident and the driver did nothing wrong), a less serious crime (it was an accident but the driver was going too fast and was unable to stop in time), a more serious crime (it was an unintentional but the driver was under the influence of alcohol), or the most serious crime possible (the driver intentionally the victim down). Students should understand that the combination of actus reus and mens rea is what makes a crime more or less serious.

98. You are prosecuting a case where a child is on trial for the murder of his own father. You have a son of your own and have a very close relationship with him. You realize that though you cannot understand how a child could kill his father, this case could fall under a defense of excuse. These cases typically seek to excuse acts committed by defendants who should not be held criminally responsible for their actions because they were too young or because their mental state prevented them from understanding the consequences of their actions. The law recognizes youthful age as a criminal defense under certain circumstances. Knowing what you do about the case, the defense of excuse, and your own relationship with your child, what is your opinion on how a child should be charged? Does it depend on the seriousness of the case or not? Why or why not? Fully explain.

ANSWER: Student responses will vary based upon their experiences and opinions about a person's ability to formulate mental intent. Students should identify that the defense of infancy is based upon the age of the child that committed the crime. For example, if a child is under the age of seven, they are considered legally incapable of forming criminal intent and therefore would not be held criminally liable for their actions. Although the exact age and which a person is no longer a juvenile and can be prosecuted as an adult differs from state to state, the trend has been for states to lower the age for prosecuting a minor as an adult.

Students might also identify that the insanity defense might be applicable, especially if the "child" was older or an adult at the time the crime occurred. If the defendant was suffering from a mental disease or defect that made them unable to appreciate the wrongfulness of their conduct, the insanity defense might be more appropriate than the insanity defense.

Finally, even though it is not an excuse defense, students might mention self-defense. If the child felt in imminent danger of death, they might be able to use this justification defense to avoid conviction.

99. Consider the actors in the courtroom and pick the three that you feel are most important to the process. What are their duties? In what ways are they similar, and how do they differ? Why do you feel that they are the most critical to the administration of justice?

ANSWER: Student responses will vary depending upon which roles they feel are most important to the legal process. Students should justify their answers by explaining the actors' duties, how they are similar to or different from other actors in the courtroom, and why they feel the role is so important to the criminal legal process.

Chapter 01 - Crime, Law, Courts, and Controversy

Students might choose from the following roles, among others: prosecutors, defense attorneys, judges, court reporters, probation officers, correctional employees, reporters, expert witnesses, witnesses, or jurors.

100. Define the term “law” in your own words. What are the four elements of law, and why are they important to establishing legitimacy in our legal system? What role does justice play in the definition of “law?”

ANSWER: Student responses on defining law will vary. The elements of law are 1) a body of rules, 2) law enacted by public officials, 3) law enacted in a legitimate manner, and 4) law is backed by the force of the state. Students should discuss that laws should be written down and accessible so that everyone understands what is required of them. They should also apply to all people equally. There should be sanctions for disobeying the law because otherwise, laws would be unenforceable.

Justice is not part of the definition of “law” due to there being no precise legal or scientific meaning for the term.
