Essay (6)

Q62. [Essay]

Contrast the traditional view of human resource management with the view of HRM today.

Suggested answer: Sample response: The traditional view was that human resource management was a cost center. A cost center uses organizational resources without generating revenue or profit. Today, however, management recognizes the ability of the human resource function to generate revenue, albeit indirectly. Indeed, human resources should function as a productivity center, which is a revenue center that increases revenues and profits by enhancing the productivity of the people within the organization. HRM increases productivity by increasing employee efficiency.

Q63. [Essay]

Describe four of the eight major responsibilities of human resource management professionals and note why each of the four is important.

Suggested answer: Sample response: Four responsibilities of HRM professionals include the legal environment, talent acquisition, training and development, and compensation and benefits. The legal environment includes laws related to EEO and diversity management. This discipline deals with equal opportunity laws and regulations as well as management of a diverse workforce, meaning it is crucial for reducing liabilities and risks to the organization. Talent acquisition manages the processes involved attracting job candidates and selecting those with the right values and skills for the organization and the jobs they're hired into. An organization requires strong employees to function well, making talent acquisition a key responsibility. After hiring employees, HR managers must engage in training and development. This discipline includes responsibility for employee learning, whether of basic job skills or management competencies. Examples include developing curricula and lesson plans and delivering training. It also involves developing talent within the company so that more senior positions can be filled by current employees. Finally, a specialist in compensation and benefits helps to determine the total rewards package, including such elements as pay, health benefits, and retirement benefits. This is important because the organization uses these elements to attract and retain the employees it needs.

Q64. [Essay]

Describe job satisfaction, employee engagement, and employee experience. How do these concepts differ from each other?

Suggested answer: Sample response: Measurements of job satisfaction have been used historically to understand employees' intent to engage with the organization, and job satisfaction is a component of employee engagement. However, employee engagement involves more than just feelings about the job. It also measures the employee's ability and willingness to performance at a high level and over an extended period of time. Employee engagement is a part of employee experience, but employee experience is about more than happiness with and performance in the job. Employee experience encompasses all the interactions a worker has with their workplace, including such dimensions as whether the worker feels a sense of belonging and a sense of purpose, for example.

Q65. [Essay]

Explain why having strategy-driven HRM and having a basic understanding of the HR legal environment are the most fundamental pieces of the HRM practitioner's model.

Suggested answer: Sample response: Human resource functions are expected to be productivity centers for the organization, and understanding strategic HRM and developing business acumen are critical to meeting this expectation. A sound strategy is the foundation for all other human resource management decisions. In addition, understanding the legal environment is important for ensuring that the rights of both the organization and employees are protected and for making sure the organization does not incur legal penalties.

Q66. [Essay]

Human resource managers have consistently faced a number of challenges in recent years. Identify at least three of the major challenges identified in recent surveys of CEOs and CHROs and explain why they are significant.

Suggested answer: Sample response: One major challenge identified in recent surveys is the issue of retaining talent—that is, motivating skilled employees to stay with the organization. If an organization regularly loses its talent, it cannot remain productive. Executives are also aware of the overall shortage of skilled labor. They want the HRM function to hone its talent acquisition strategies to find and select workers with needed skills. Both retaining talent and finding new talent ensure that the organization runs well. A third business need that is on executives' minds is the need to improve the people management skills of supervisors. Executives know that leadership positions are critical to the success of the organization, and thus they want human resource professionals to assist the organization in strengthening leaders and the pool of employees who could be considered successors for such roles.

Q67. [Essay]

Identify the five critical dependent variables that managers must control to compete as a modern organization. What is the relationship between these variables?

Suggested answer: Sample response: The five critical variables are productivity, employee engagement and experience, turnover, absenteeism, and quiet quitting. Productivity is the amount of output that an organization gets per unit of input. The two parts of productivity are efficiency and effectiveness. Employee engagement is a combination of job satisfaction, ability, and a willingness to perform for the organization at a high level and over an extended period of time. Employee experience is broader than engagement, as it encompasses all the factors that drive engagement as well as the totality of other interactions between the employee and the workplace. Overall, positive employee experience tends to have a positive impact on productivity. Turnover is the permanent loss of workers from the organization. When people quit, the departures are considered voluntary turnover. When the organization fires people, this is involuntary turnover. In either case, the loss of skills and the expense of refilling the job are costs to the organization. Absenteeism is the temporary absence of employees when they are scheduled to work. Unplanned absences can disrupt productivity and represent an unanticipated cost to the organization. Quiet quitting, on the other hand, is when an employee is physically present but is largely disengaged from their tasks and is thus unproductive. In all, managing these five variables can substantially impact an organization's success.

Describe the five core dimensions of employee experience according to an IBM study and identify at least three actions that organizational leaders must take to promote positive employee experience.

Suggested answer: Sample response: The IBM study identified the five core dimensions. First is a sense of belonging, or a feeling of being part of a team, group, or organization. Second is a sense of purpose, which means understanding why one's work matters. Third is a sense of achievement, or a feeling that one is accomplishing something meaningful. Fourth is a sense of happiness—a pleasant feeling arising in and around work. Fifth is vigor, or the presence of energy, enthusiasm, and excitement at work. To promote a positive employee experience, leaders need to create an environment of trust. They can foster supportive coworker relationships, provide meaningful recognition of work, and provide opportunities for employees to receive feedback and grow professionally. Additionally, they need to empower employees and give them a voice in the workplace. Leaders should support employees in achieving work-life balance.

Q98. [Essay]

Describe the four major human resource management skill sets. Include at least one example of each in your description.

Suggested answer: Sample response: The key human resource management skill sets are technical skills, interpersonal skills, conceptual and design skills, and business skills. Technical skills include the ability to use methods and techniques to perform a task. Examples include the ability to apply the laws, rules, and regulations relating to employment and the ability to use an understanding of interviewing techniques to select job candidates. Interpersonal skills provide the ability to understand, communicate, and work well with individuals and groups through developing effective relationships. An example would be using empathy to understand an employee who is describing a problem they are having at work. Conceptual and design skills provide the ability to evaluate a situation, identify alternatives, select an alternative, and implement a solution to the problem. A human resource professional might use conceptual skills to understand the organization's strategy and how well the HRM function was supporting it, and they would use design skills to develop innovative improvements where needed. Business skills provide analytical and quantitative skills, including the in-depth knowledge of how the business works and of its budgeting and strategic planning processes. For example, a human resource professional might use business skills to determine the impact on costs if the company hired more employees in a certain area, provided existing employees with more training so they could be more efficient, or contracted the work out to a vendor.

Q99. [Essay]

Explain four of the six human resource management responsibilities of the line manager. Give examples of how each may be implemented on the job.

Suggested answer: Sample response: Line managers are required to have knowledge of several topics. One area is legal considerations. Line managers must be familiar with the major employment laws so that they do not accidentally violate them in their daily interactions with their employees. For example, they would need to know law related to mandated work breaks when scheduling employees so they do not violate labor laws. Additionally, they must be aware of labor cost controls. This involves understanding how to manage the costs involved with hiring and maintaining employees and what they are legally and ethically allowed to do to control labor costs. An example of this might be knowing how much overtime employees can safely work and creating a schedule that respects that. The leadership and motivation responsibility involves effectively using motivation techniques to elicit the best possible performance from their team members. One example might be creating a compensation program that rewards employees for performing desired behaviors at work. Training and development is another responsibility of line managers since they are often the first point of contact to determine whether an employee needs or wants training or development. This may be to address immediate organizational goals or to prepare employees for future positions or changes in their current positions. Another responsibility includes appraisal and promotion, where the manager evaluates their subordinates' work performance and holds performance review discussions. In addition, they are often asked who should be considered for promotions, since their job is to know their people's capabilities and limitations. Finally, line managers have a primary responsibility for the safety and security of the workers in an organization. They need to be familiar with the laws that deal with occupational safety and health, security procedures to protect people and property from threats, and methods for dealing with hazards when they arise.
